Paris Styles

by... MARY FENTRESS

PARIS (U.P.)—Climaxing the most brilliant social season Paris has seen in post-war days, the Grand Prix de Longchamps offered an excellent birdseye view of all Paris fashions—from sporty linens to trailing chiffons, and from tiny twisted turbans to huge crownless capelins.

A "print parade" the great race certainly was above all else, and the smartest prints were either very unusual or very conservative. Despite all predictions, the combinations of fuchsia, bright blue and mauve still reign supreme at all times of day.

As witness of the fact there is lace print in tones of carbon blue, "Shocking" pink and pale mauve. It is seen everywhere smart women gather.

Among other "unusual" prints prevailing at Longchamps was one with gayly colored backgrounds printed on a white background, one with navy leaves and stems delicately stenciled on a grayish-blue background; a carbon blue printed with morning glories; a lemon yellow printed with black mummies; and a navy printed with miniature signs.

A navy bolero half hid a dark navy silk printed with brilliant red strawberries.

Polka dots led the more conservative print field, but became striking in their mode of conception. Navy silk with large pink dots was used for more than one dress body and then reversed to form applied skirt motifs or panels up the skirt sides. A youthful dress of pink dots in white on a navy background had a high Peter Pan collar edged in white rick-rack, the same ric-rac being repeated on the bottom of the skirt and the short-sleeved cuff tops.
